If you want to take a picture or mark a location, but don't want the app to be permanent or whenever you want, Bouncer is supported by Dertor. Removed the permission immediately after you quit an app, Bouncer would automatically remove permissions for you immediately, allowing you to skip your day without worrying about third-party apps eating into your phone's battery or invading your privacy. The bouncer works with one-time permissions and even for permissions that apps need in the background. However, if the app was continuously used, these apps would be in the foreground quite often. Working MechanismBouncer includes an accessibility service that is enabled after you grant permission and gives you the option to remove it. After you quit the specific app with permission and go to your device's home screen, Bouncer opens that app's settings and quickly removes the permission. Bouncer does not need permission to do his job, which makes it very trustworthy. App-specific information cannot be displayed. It only accesses settings on your phone so it could disable permissions. And even if Bouncer ends up accessing data that it shouldn't, it can't transfer it anywhere because it doesn't have Internet permissions. Bouncer can be used for any feature, but as you employ apps all day they will be in the foreground a variety of time. • Increased security, privacy and battery life • There is no need to be annoyed with what apps do in the background • No sophisticated setup desired (no root or adb)How does it work? Bouncer uses an accessibility service. It asks while you grant a permission and gives you the choice to take it. If you are going to live, Bouncer will open the settings of the app and take your permission extraordinarily quickly. Why should I believe Bouncer? Sure, an app that can fold out permissions can also turn them around. However, Bouncer does not request permissions. It can't see data in apps except for the Settings app (so it may fold out permissions). Bouncer would not have the web permission, so even if it can get sensitive data (which it may not), it could not transfer wherever. All this information is easy to
